If a psoric miasm should have been roused by the fever, complicating the fever, and rendering it very obstinate, the antipsorics have to be employed against it: Tinct. sulph., Lycop., Amm. mur., Calc. carb., Sepia, Calc. sulph. (Hep. sulph.), and others. 89. China cachexia. A China cachexia is an intermittent fever which has been treated with large doses of Quinine, without getting well, and has become complicated with the symptoms of a China poisoning. A China cachexia requires the greatest discretion and circumspection on the part of the physician. It is a threefold complication of disease: the original fever which is scarcely yet recognizable, the morbid disposition originally existing in the organism, and having become roused by the fever, and the poisoning by the drug. The first thing to be done is to remove as much as possible...
