The buttresses are of two stages of small projection. Interior. It is only on entering that we become aware of considerable Norman remains. The Nave is of six bays and a half, the Tower trenching on what would have been the seventh bay westward, half the arch of which becomes a flying buttress to the Tower. The three pillars next to the Tower on the south are cylindrical, with square ension-shaped capitals, and the round arches have plain soffits, but the second arch has a round beading running along its edge on the side next the nave, and the third has, in addition, a chevron moulding, but no part of these decorations occupies the chamfer plane, or prevents the general effect of the soffits from being flat. The piers and arches opposite are different from these, and each from the others. The first pier is cylindrical, with foliated capital; the second is in section a square, with semicircles attached to the sides, and the foliated capital is of considerable elegance; the third is in general effect a square, with the angles rebated, and shafts in the hollows, while on the west side a semicircle is added, which is in fact a respond to the preceding pier. The two angleshafts, towards the Aisle, terminate in caps at little more than half the height. Upon the inner door is the following legend. Jlhon (lampoon antJ 3H)eatl f)l)S tDijf. U of the piers. The first...
