Excerpt: . . . you will let me go quietly away--- Youll do nothin of the sort, said the man; yerll take those things with yer an ide em as I say, an youll carry em about with yer wherever yer goes, and that wont be out of the country neither, and wen theyre wanted yerll give em up, and yer wont give em up neither except to me, or to a paper thats signed by me, William Rawlins, and I signs my name like this-- He pulled out a stump of a pencil, and putting the post-card down on one of the planks, he knelt and wrote his name. I puts this mark after it, and he held the card before my eyes, wot no one but you and me will know, not even the weazel ere; so therell be no cheatin. Half-dazed, I took the card in my hand and looked at it; his name was written in big round letters, with three stars after it, so--William Rawlzns. He seemed to think the matter settled, and his manner became more bullying. Recollect, he said, if yer breathes a word bout these jewls or about us, or this mornin, or bout anythin that yerve seen and eard, well chuck that kid youve got with you into a pond as if it was a cat with a stone round its neck, or well slit its throat open before yer can count three, therell be one of the five...
